1. Naszkowski, State Secretary in the Polish Foreign Ministry, has not yet revealed a political point of view of his own. While acting as ambassador in Moscow he learned how to adapt himself to the views of the Kremlin. Those politicians who, instead of looking upon political problems from the Polish point of view, prefer to be mere tools of the Kremlin have made their way with increasing success into the highest governmental posts in Warsaw during the last two years. 25X1
2. Wladyslaw Dworakowski and Zenon Nowak, two junior members of the Polish Politburo, the latter also deputy prime minister, have just returned to Warsaw from Moscow. Their measures, such as the acceleration of the process of the collectivization of farming, reflect the line adopted by the Kremlin. Senior politicians such as Minc, Zawadzki, Bierut, and Berman know, however, that there is a difference between Polish Communism and Soviet Russian Communism. Accordingly, their approach to Communism is less dogmatic than that of Nowak and Dworakowski. 25X1
